NEW DIRECTIONS for the New Decade

Where do internal auditors stand as the global economy forges ahead on the road to recovery and as the new decade begins? It is a good time for all internal audit professionals to reflect and take stock.

The internal audit profession has been on a thrilling ride over the past 10 years with the leap forward being brought about by the current definition of internal auditing and a series of remarkable corporate failures globally. Back then, most internal auditors were not performing many of the activities that internal audit function today would regard as commonplace. In particular, the new definition empowered auditors to spend much more time thinking about risks through a wider lens. Many internal auditors also started to act as consultants, using their risk and control skills to help management identify business solutions. Internal auditors were comfortably transitioning into the new model that emphasised the value added by the profession in a flexible framework of service delivery.

However, the recent global financial crisis has demonstrated that some appalling risk management practices have already been allowed to develop within many organisations. Predictably stakeholders’ expectation has changed again and internal auditors have to rise to the occasion to ensure that they respond to the changing circumstances.

Internal auditors need to make their organisations aware of what they can contribute - providing board level assurance on risk management. Through active participation in helping their organisations understand and evaluate significant risks across the organisation to adopting risk based auditing, internal auditors can bring a lot to the table. However, auditors should make sure that they have the skills needed to provide the new kind of assurance that is needed.

This year conference themed NEW DIRECTIONS FOR THE NEW DECADE emphasises on the skills required to position internal auditors as the “only independent function that has a finger on the risk - pulse of the organisation”. Apart from the general and concurrent track sessions, internal auditors will have longer knowledge sessions looking at emerging issues in areas of risk management, corporate culture, IT and soft skills.

Your participation in this conference will give you the advantage as the profession enters the new decade with optimism, building on the success that has led to the internal auditing current stature.
